

1.A Introduction

In this chapter, we begin our study of the theory of individual decision making by considering it in a completely abstract setting. The remaining chapters in Part I develop the analysis in the context of explicitly economic decisions.

The starting point for any individual decision problem is a set of possible (mutually exclusive) alternatives from which the individual must choose. In the discussion that follows, we denote this set of alternatives abstractly by X .